Working with Literary Text Outside the Classroom the Role of Multi-Aspect Synthesis in Personality Development

Olga N. Chelyukanova*a

* Corresponding author: Olga N. Chelyukanova, olgaRibakova@fromru.com

*Nizhny Novgorod state University of N. I. Lobachevsky (Arzamas branch), 4 Sevastopol'skaya str., Arzamas, Russia

Abstract

The multi-aspect synthesis is an important stylistic feature of the 50-80s of the XX century, specifically reflected in children’s literature, and in the individual style of each writer. The author identifies the main trend in the fulfillment of the multi-aspect synthesis potential in Russian children’s literature of the 1950–1980s, and its role in the moral, spiritual, and intellectual education of children and adolescents. Besides, the author shows how children’s and juvenile literature of the period is influenced by the respective art forms, new features imparted to the verbal art by others, and the capability of the literature itself to influence a growing and developing personality increase. Chelyukanova O.N. notes that making school-children familiar with literary works based on the multi-aspect synthesis, produces a many-sided emotional impact appealing to children’s feelings. Fantasy, fairytale, anti-utopia, humour — are all vectors of children and juvenile literature, and appear in various planes to instill the values empowering the reader to think and feel freely, demonstrating the true and the false, and giving a real and an imaginary freedom.

Key words: Leisure time, children’s prose, intra-literary synthesis, art synthesis, game, psychological training, fairytale, fantasy, humor.

1. Introduction

Arrangement of school-children’s leisure time is one of the most pressing issues in today’s pedagogics. Communication with a good children’s book undoubtedly integrates quite a number of leisure time activities, such as games, creative activities, self-education, entertainment, etc. The most efficient pieces are those based on the intra-literary and art synthesis described theoretically in the works of Y.I. Mineralov (Mineralov Yu.I., 1999), I.G. Mineralova (Mineralova I.G., 1999), G.Y. Zavgorodnyaya (Zavgorodnyaya G.Y., 2010), S.A. Vasilyev (Vasilyev S.A., 2007).

The research methods have been developed by the above-mentioned contemporaneous scientists.

The purpose of the research is to show how children’s literature of the second half of the XX century, with its important artistic and stylistic features, can arouse interest to reading and multi-aspect creative activity.

The article covers the methodical, psycho-pedagogical, and philosophic aspect of studying art practices of children’s prose written in the 50-60s of the XX century using empirical data.

Most favorable conditions for synthesis in the children’s literature of the 50–80s of the XX century, were created by literary tale genre and forms, based on a specific conventional imagery. The fairytale genre was approached by writers such as, V. Gubarev, L. Geraskina, V. Krapivin, Yu. Tomin, etc. The importance of their works is conditioned not only by the obvious use of the various synthesis forms, but by creating to various vital spiritual and moral problems. What is meant here is that, in these literary works, words attain such supplementary meanings other than their lexical meanings.

V. V. Medvedev with his trilogy “Barankin’s Fantasy World” was most convincing in this metagene. The idea of spiritual and moral revival was the main idea the book. In this context, the fairytale story is of educational nature. The idea is embodied through multiple artistic devices used by the author, including a whimsical combination in the story structure of fairytale and reality, as well as humour, game, psychological and fantastic elements typical for the genre.

Being an artist who received film director education, Medvedev, even in children fairytales arranges the contents in a way synonymous to movies. A trivial pedagogical cliché used when addressing a child “Be a human!” is of key ontological importance in the book. The writer turns the conversation with the reader from humoristic and preaching levels, to the level of speculation involving all “aspects” of a human: biology, physiology, psychology, sociology, ideology, philosophy. These aspects are interlaced in the plot as characters that are not only comprehensible for a child, but also answer the key questions about his relationships with the world. Medvedev was not only interested in getting answers to the trivial questions, but also to complicated ones, for example - “what does it mean to be human?”. As an actor and a film director, he put both the character and the reader in the situation of an “actor’s etude” - “me in the suggested circumstances”. For children these “sacred” words are normally just a meaningless phrase, whereas the moral concept itself is the basis of the entire humanistic morals. It is this profound moral and philosophical content, inherent in the concept of "human", that Medvedev decided to bring home to children.

Taking into account the age of the readers, the writer understood that the visibility of characters, can be achieved using the literary tale form always favored by all children and adolescents, and combining various genres and allusions to them, of conventionally fantastic, as well as lyrical, humouristic and realistic kinds. Such artistic understanding of the childhood world was observed in the works of A.G. Aleksin, L.B. Geraskin, N.N. Nosov, V.P. Krapivin, when they inherited and paraphrased the traditions of K.I. Chukovsky, S.Ya. Marshak, Yu.K. Olesha, A.P. Gaidar, etc. Medvedev certainly considered the experience accumulated by the folk art, and included them in the expressions of most complicated philosophic sentences through fairytale plots and characters. Such experiences were fruitfully manifested in Russian, as well as West European literary tales.

Medvedev’s fairytale story not only describes how one can ‘wake up’ the interests of young characters, but also help in the growth of consciousness, and shapes their spiritual aspect. Because a literary work for a reader is “both a “container” for certain feelings and thoughts he possesses and expresses, and an “actuator” (stimulator) for his/her own spiritual initiative and energy” (Halizev V.E., 2005).

Tomin’s story “A, B, C, D and Others” is a typical example of genre multidimensionality in what is understood under the literary tale concept. Frankly speaking, stories by Yury Tomin cannot be related to the fairytale genre with its mandatory components present in the folk art, but they fall within the genre and type definition of a literary tale, the style and all constituents of which can be rather different from those of its folk predecessor. The story contents are shaped within science fiction ideas and images, the reader’s attention is held with a number of detective means, school themes and problems — teachers, camping, adventures — neutralize the “non-confidence” in what is being depicted, contribute to the feeling of authenticity and certainty towards the series of depicted events, as well as the transformation of the inner world of the characters — both children and adults.

Literary work transposition into the language of animation, movie, illustration, and other a priori synthetic forms, undoubtedly, acquire complementary, but still important meanings for aesthetic sensibility development and child’s personality formation as a whole. These transpositions of a verbal text into the language of other arts become a constituent part of the artistic world of a children’s tale. This synthesis is the basis of powerful intellectual and emotional impacts on a young reader’s view. This phenomenon is an important stylistic feature of the epoch.

The genre synthesis in children’s literary tale and fantasy of the 50-80s of the XX century opens unlimited opportunities for the implementation and functioning of the rules and laws of a children’s game in a piece, improving the reading motivation.

Game is put in the center of a pre-school child’s life, as a specially arranged activity that allows a child to understand social laws, to obtain new social skills, to learn how to use the environment, and control his/her own behavior. In the 1960s, Soviet developmental psychology arrived at the idea that game is the principal activity for children education, and thus the game phenomenon appeared on the pages of children’s books, however, it happened a bit earlier in the West. Russian and foreign literary studies pay close attention to the game problem, and it’s crucially important, since game is used for developing models of adults’ life. The characters and readers of works by V. Krapivin, Yu. Yakovlev, A. Aleksin, V. Medvedev, etc. learn about life through game. Game is directly connected with literature. According to J. Huizinga, poetry originated from game and developed in accordance with game forms (Huizinga http://rumagic.com/ru_zar/sci_philosophy/heyzinga/0/).
The role of game is of most significance in fairytale and fantastic pieces for children. The children fantasy genre opens vast opportunities for genre synthesis, establishes the rules and laws of game, and correlates them with literary work construction laws. In Russian literature of the 1950 – 1980s prosaic cycles for children series, not collections of tales, were rather efficient, especially the most popular one by Kir Bulychev (I. Mozheiko) (1934) — a cycle of fantastic stories about a girl called Alisa, through whose eyes a young reader sees a fantastic world.

Game as a means of cognition connects fairytale and fantasy, allowing Alisa to comprehend the laws of the world, gives impetus to development, shapes the artistic environment of both individual stories, and the cycle as a whole. In Kir Bulychev’s Adventures of Alisa, the imaginary world game is a determinant factor shaping the genre and imagery space of the cycle. Fantastic worlds built according to the rules of children’s games, provide the option of creating a simple and clear world view, clear and understandable for a young reader. This is the way the writer builds up the semantic model of an imaginary world, reflecting the real one in the game form. These models are essentially created for studying real life situations, and therefore are inherently related to the children’s game phenomenon, as well as fairytale as another real world model. The genre structure of the pieces included in the cycle is based on the synthesis of fantasy, adventure novel, travel novel, literary and folk tale. The fantastic aspect is a plot shaping factor in the cycle works, it has an important cycle shaping function connecting genre features of a story and tale in the cycle with the same fantastic “realia”.

The fantastic tale/story genre opens vast opportunities for creation of a new inner form, through combinations of characters and plots traditionally “bound” to certain genres, but due to the nature of the game, creates an efficient life-building focus.

Language game in children’s book is a special technique for influencing mental activity. Thus, the language of V. Medvedev’s characters is characterized by bright metaphors, a plethora of wordplays, original imagery, emphasizing the originality and vivacity of the character’s mind. The wordplay is sometimes reflected by the characters as part of the game. In the story by Yu. Tomin “A, B, C, D and Others» the characters purposely juggle with words and phrases, playing with different meanings. It should be noted that language game is one of manifestations of common human desire to play, actuating the creative ability of homo ludens (Huizinga).

An integral part of children’s culture is humour, which moral lessons while taking away the psychological barrier. The blossom of humourous literature for children was observed in the 1950-1970s. “Like other trends in children’s literature, the purpose of humour has always been entertainment and psychological relaxation, and on the other hand, improvement of manners and prevention of misconduct”. (Mineralova I.G., 2002). The well-established genres and forms (fable, parable, apologue, cautionary tale) with upbringing functions, are replaced with lyrical and humorous stories, genre sketches, essays with pronounced psychological training features, fantastic stories and fairytales, “unfolding;” or paraphrasing trivial morals for children.

A book for a child is a key to self-education. Convergence of the artistic, public, and popular scientific origins (V. Medvedev, S. Georgievskaya, etc.), play a special part in shaping the inner form of quite a number of works. Many of scientific and public material extends the boundaries of narration, enlarges and satiates it intellectually.
In the children’s literature of the 1950-80s science fiction and fantasy in the best works of art, turned to be multi-functional on moral and aesthetic levels. The fantastic story genre was brightly embodied in a number of works by children writers of the period in question. Such pieces seem to outline approaches to the unknown, perform a kind of aesthetic approbation of emerging ideas and concepts, express the primary, most generalized, often theoretical, and rather still abstract perception of phenomena, emerging in the world.

The game function of fantasy makes it similar to fairytale, but a number of other functions that allow integration of this genre with science, myth, and fiction, contribute to shaping the impression about a special functional nature of fantasy. Fantasy here is like a dream, when there is no romantic dissonance between the dream and reality, and the reality is an incentive space for the dream and its fulfillment. Penetration of fairytale elements to the fantasy genre generated a number of fairytale, as well as fantastic “series” for children, and involvement of the game element became a serious lyrical and psychological basis for dynamic and easily comprehensible works.

Stories and tales by B.L. Rakhmanin (1933-2000) are based on a close synthesis of two origins — the fantastic and the lyrical one. Their combination and interaction are typical for the style of the 1950–80s as a whole, and for the individual style of B. Rakhmanin, who wrote not only prose, but poems as well. The lyrical and fantastic aspects in Rakhmanin’s pieces are so closely interrelated, that one can speak concurrently about the lyrical and fantastic focus of his works.

“The Handless Clock” (1975) is based on a fantastic story about a “time travel”. Boris Rakhmanin uses fantastic aspect as a means to make existential problems of the real Russian history more acute. The fantastic aspect does not create a different history, but places the reader in the situation “me in the suggested circumstances”, make him/her think about his/her responsibility for the present and the future, about the responsibility that was typical for those who participated in that Great War, and the victory we inherited.

Russian children’s literature of the second half of the XX century tends to artistic synthesis that was approved and emphatically manifested in children’s literature of the first third of the XX century. Close attention to art forms connecting literature and music to literature and painting, is of the same nature as similar phenomena of the 1910–1920s: connecting arts, in order to transform and change the inner world of the child.

Children literature essentially appeals to the inner resource of art synthesis, in which a more profound spiritual, moral, aesthetic, and humanistic impact on the child’s or adolescent’s personality is produced. Formation of prose genres for children and adolescents of the period in question is directly connected with the trends of childhood cultural development. Arts addressed to children and adolescents use educational forms to attract the younger generation to versatile creative activities, instigating free intellectual, emotional, artistic and moral development of a personality in the society.

The elements of synthesis between two art forms — literature and music — are more or less inherent in Russian children’s literature of the 1950–1980s. The basis of many children’s works in this period were, the harmonious involvement of the “musical” principle of symphonic style and polyphony in the artistic fabric of the story, a polyphonic flow of the main motives, their inter-penetration and harmonious creative coexistence, or the illustrative nature of the musical “text”, the emphasis and expressions of their contents, description of the characters and relations between them. Thus, in R. Pogodin’s story “The Red Horses” harmonious “musical”, the combination of symphony, architecture, fresco painting, smithing technique, craft that outgrew into art, live nature, and the flow of the main motives — their inter-penetration and harmonious creative coexistence, are the guarantees of humanism in its highest sense.

The use of pictorial means, particularly, ekphrasis, as well as musical citations and allusions in the works of children’s writers, provides the option for extending artistic horizons of prose in the aesthetic, spiritual, and moral development of children and adolescents.

Art synthesis in children’s literature of the 1950–1980s is a bright and efficient phenomenon. Music, painting, ballet, architecture, theatre, radio, cinematography, and television, penetrating into the works for children, appeal to enrich children’s imagination, picture bright images, shape almost visual cinematographic contents. They allow the author to visually “show” not only the “ideas” of the time period, but make the reader to actively share the characters’ feelings, to correlate his/her own life with the lives of those who “bring up themselves”, who discover the world in its beauty and complexity, since the purpose of synthesis is to influence the inner world of a person in a way, so he will grow up new, gladly accepting life, harmoniously developing, beautiful and happy.

Many works of Russian children’s prose of the 50–80s of the XX century proved the tendency of the immersion of movie techniques into literature. An expressive example of such synthesis is V. Medvedev’s novel “The Wedding March” (1974). The script-like nature of the novel is written with details like: the presence of characters, the life of which is closely connected with, the world of theatre, cinema, ballet, circus — in other words, it was written with art forms, implemented like a script. The script is based on the development of a conflict between the art, truly reflecting life and pseudo-art, substituting the truth with something sophisticated and delusive.

Writers of the 1950–1980s. (A. Aleksin, V. Medvedev, Yu. Tomin, V. Krapivin, etc.) Actively translated the texts of their books into cinematographic language, creating scripts. Working with literary texts, is a perfect way to turn schoolchildren to reading and attentive watching films, understanding the specificity of movies and word arts. The use of cinematographic interpretations provides an impetus to reading a literary source and contributes to individual interpretation of the book by each child.

2. Results

Main trends in the fulfillment of multi-aspect synthesis potential in Russian children’s literature of the 1950–1980s, and its role in the moral, spiritual, and intellectual education of children and adolescents. Besides, one should see how children and juvenile literature of the period is influenced by the respective art forms, what new features are imparted to the verbal art, and the capability of the literature itself to influence a growing and developing personality increase.
Conclusion

Making schoolchildren familiar with literary works based on the multi-aspect synthesis produces a many-sided emotional impact appealing to children’s feelings. Fantasy, fairytale, anti-utopia, humour — all vectors of children’s and juvenile literature, appear in various levels, to instill the values empowering readers to think and feel freely, demonstrating the true and the false, and giving a real and an imaginary freedom.

References

Huizinga, J. Homo ludens – access mode: http://rumagic.com/ru_zar/sci_philosophy/heyzinga/0/